The classical framework of rhetoric, established by Aristotle, remains central to understanding persuasive communication. These three pillars—ethos, pathos, and logos—serve as the foundation for crafting compelling messages.

Rhetorical Questions

Questions posed for effect, not requiring an answer, prompt the audience to think.

This technique involves the audience emotionally and intellectually.

Analogies and Metaphors

Comparing unfamiliar concepts to familiar ones clarifies ideas and makes messages more persuasive.

Example: Describing a complex policy as "building a bridge to the future" evokes cooperation and progress.
